Search Results: What the heck?

So now you have done a search and have over 1 million results. What does this all mean?

Aberdeen, my main computer, just told me my motherboard had a “thermal event” and both my motherboard and the rest of my computer component family were no longer interested in working for me. Ever again.

See page 2 for my initial Google search results.

Interpretation Guide

Box 1 shows I had over 5 million hits for the words “intel motherboard.” I do not use these numbers. At best they indicate my search terms were too broad.

Box 2 discloses “sponsored links.” These are paid advertisements and Google does not guarantee their relevancy.

Box 3 – I use the free Google Desktop program to index the files on my computer. This shows I already had some information on my computer.

Box 4 – “OneBox Results” This is a source of specialized information that goes beyond the web pages regularly indexed by Google. Sometimes these can save you considerable time. OneBox results include news, weather and other particularized information. In my case, the shopping bag speaks for itself.

Google Lite – IRS Intranet

A lot of useful information is buried in low-circulation, specialty newsletters. This includes material on tax law and procedures, information technology and administrative goodies.

Try this. Enter “newsletter” – no quotation marks.

Box 5 – The results at last. The first line is the page title and link. The title is created by the author of the page. The text underneath is an excerpt from the page. Following the text is the web address, the approximate size of the file and the date the file was last modified.

Box 6 – Indented Result – This means that more than one relevant result was found from the same web page. The most relevant is listed first and the next best page is indented. Also, a link for more results can be provided.

Not Too Basic

To locate search terms in a large web page use the browser’s search command, usually Control-F, to search for your terms within the web page.

Season’s Greetings and I wish you a safe and happy holiday.
